Description of Property and Justification: (Please attach map and photo)

The Camp Ritchie Historic District embodies the rich heritage of commitment that individual states have made toward the nation. In addition to the historic theme of military preparedness and training, the stone buildings are architecturally significant for the use of locally available labor, stone and timber and for the organization of the Post. Thus, the District is considered eligible under Criteria A and C.

DESCRIPTION

Description Summary

The resources within the bounds of the Camp Ritchie Historic District illustrate the history of the Post as a significant element in the military preparedness and support of United States military defense. Although the installation covers an area of 638 acres, the historic district consists of approximately 126 acres on the eastern side of the Post. Established in 1926, the post was originally developed as a Maryland National Guard Training Facility. The installation was leased by the federal government in 1942, immediately after our entrance into World War II, and subsequently played a significant role in the war effort. The installation was selected due to its close proximity to the capital, as well as its relative remoteness and defensible position in a saddle-like topographic setting in the Catoctin Mountain Range of western Maryland near the Pennsylvania border.

A total of 122 properties are present within the Camp Ritchie Historic District, including 113 buildings, six structures and three definitive landscape features. Of these properties, 103 are contributing elements to the Historic District, including 96 buildings, 2 gate posts with attached walls, a dam, a pier (Bldg. 12), two lakes and a parade ground. This list includes 28 World War II temporary buildings, which can be demolished without further Section 106 consultation per a programmatic memorandum of agreement among the United States Department of Defense, the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation and the National Conference of State Historic Preservation Officers. The remaining properties are buildings, sites or structures constructed after 1950 and are considered non-contributing elements to the historic district. Modern infill construction on the west side of the lakes has isolated three buildings, 710, 711 and 860, from the remainder of the historic Fort Ritchie buildings, eliminating them from consideration as part of the historic district.

General Description

The buildings comprising the Camp Ritchie Historic District are stone buildings constructed to support the Maryland National Guard's Camp Ritchie, a summer training camp, and temporary wooden buildings constructed to support the U.S. entrance into World War II. The site was chosen primarily based upon its proximity to the Western Maryland railway and the telegraph line (Dietrich 1972:3). Other deciding factors were its "altitude, picturesque surroundings, topography and accessibility to both road and railroad" (Strain 1993:219). The site was formerly occupied by the Buena Vista Ice Company and the camp was designed to accommodate two lakes originally associated with its occupation. Along with the Parade Ground, the lakes serve as significant features of the landscape.

Overlooking the Parade Ground is the Post Headquarters, which, along with three aligned buildings, serves as the visual and pivotal axis for the majority of the contributing elements to the historic district. Each side of the axis is a roughly symmetrical design in terms of building location and massing. While the original layout as planned by the architect and builder Captain Robert F. Barrick has been interrupted by the construction of W.W. II temporary buildings, the integrity of the original landscape design remains.

The original Camp Ritchie buildings are typically simple, one to two story structures constructed of fieldstone with gable roofs and a minimum of architectural detail. Character-defining features include decorative rafter ends and prominent chimneys. The buildings exhibit the influence of Tudor Revival and Craftsmen styles. The most elaborate building, the Post Headquarters, is the focal point of the installation. It is constructed in a castellated style, mimicking the form and features, such as parapets, of medieval castles.

The original buildings are constructed of local fieldstone and timber. The camp designer and builder, Captain Robert Barrick, employed local workers and materials to build the camp. A portable saw mill and a steam-powered rock crusher were the main mechanical tools, while dynamite was used to blast the larger rocks (Camp Ritchie and the Resort Area: 9). Stone was used in construction of the buildings, gate posts, and walls, and was crushed for use in road and railroad beds.

The headquarters building (200), the gate posts and the stone wall are all constructed in the castellated style and many of the remaining large structures include buttressed walls with bays (Buildings 160, 360 and 700) and/or a courtyard (Buildings 601-603). While this style is often associated with post-Civil War 19th century military construction in the United States, its use at Camp Ritchie represents a very late and unusual use of the style. By 1910, the castellated style had gone out of fashion for military construction projects within the U.S. Army and for National Guard facilities along the east coast of the U.S. The selection of the style in 1926 reflects a preference within the command structure of the Maryland National Guard for the castellated style, with one factor possibly being the proposed location in the mountainous setting of Western Maryland.

The enlisted personnel, kitchens/mess halls ("finger buildings"), administration buildings and headquarters were located in the central swale to the south of the parade ground. The engineering buildings were located across the parade grounds on the southern side of the lakes, while the commanding officers were located on the lower mountain slopes on the north side above the lakes.

Several resources within the bounds of the Camp Ritchie Historic District pre-date the establishment of the Camp, but were subsequently incorporated into it and added to the character of the facility. These include the two constructed lakes, the upper dam, and the officer's housing units 004 and 155. Although these five resources all predate the creation of Camp Ritchie in 1926, their integration and use directly contributes to the history of the Post. For example, Captain Robert Barrick designed and directed clearing, layout and construction operations from his residence at Building 004.

Although most building activity ceased at the inception of the Depression in 1929, beginning in late 1931 and continuing through 1934, the New Deal ushered in a number of construction and landscape projects at the Post through the Works Progress Administration and Civilian Conservation Corps. This work carried out the completion of Barrick's plans using the same stylistic parameters and design elements initiated in 1926.

A virtual explosion of construction activity followed the lease of the property by the U.S. government in 1942. The majority of the new construction included barracks, administration and classroom buildings necessary to carry out the new change of mission at then Camp Ritchie: the development of a defense intelligence and counter-intelligence force. The new structures, which broke with tradition and relied on wood wall construction, were placed in most of the open spaces that had been carefully designed by Barrick to create the separation of various Maryland National Guard units and to make use of the limited usable space on the installation.

Despite the effect on the original design, the World War II buildings are significant to the development of Camp Ritchie and are included as contributing elements to the historic district. However, it should be noted that these buildings are covered by the Programmatic Memorandum of Agreement among the United States Department of Defense, the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation and the National Conference of State Historic Preservation Officers Regarding Demolition of W.W.II Temporary Buildings.

A complete description of the buildings and structures within the bounds of the Camp Ritchie Historic District is contained in Appendix IX of the Cultural Resource Management Plan for Fort Ritchie (1995). This material includes Maryland Inventory of Historic Properties Forms for each resource. A list of those resources that comprise the contributing elements of the Maryland National Guard period are provided in Table 1. The non-contributing elements are presented in Table 2. The dates contained in this document are considered accurate and supersede those found in the Cultural Resource Management Plan for Fort Ritchie (1995).

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Summary Statement

The Camp Ritchie Historic District embodies the rich heritage of commitment that individual states have made toward the nation. In addition to the historic theme of military preparedness and training, the stone buildings are architecturally significant for the use of locally available labor, stone and timber and for the organization of the Post. Thus, the District is considered eligible under criteria A and C. The following history and context statement will address these criteria.

Resource History and Historic Context

In 1926, the State of Maryland determined that the location of a defunct natural ice processing plant, Buena Vista Ice Company, should be the site of their National Guard summer training facility. The locus is positioned in an upland saddle topographic setting below Quirauk Mountain in the Catoctin Mountains of Western Maryland at its border with Pennsylvania (Friedman et al. 1995:2-4). At the time of purchase, the locus included two constructed lakes, a number of habitable structures, a spur line of the Western Maryland Railway and a telegraph line (Dietrich 1972:3). Named after the popular governor, Albert C. Ritchie, who served from 1919 to 1934 and instituted numerous economic and social reform programs, construction of Camp

Ritchie was placed in the hands of Captain Robert F. Barrick, a self-taught architect and engineer, by Major General Milton A. Reckord, Adjutant General of the Maryland National Guard. The presence of the District was dependent on each of their efforts. Development of the installation during this phase primarily took place in two stages due to interruption by the "crash of '29" and the early Depression years.

Military Importance The Camp Ritchie Historic District is eligible for listing in the National Register of Historic Places on the basis of Criterion A, in this instance its association with the history and development of military preparedness, training and National defense. These objectives were personified in the financial contribution that Maryland citizenry made in developing Camp Ritchie as a model updated National Guard facility between 1926 and 1941.

The National Guard was first organized in 1903 and later strengthened by the 1916 National Defense Act. Following W.W. I, the development of numerous National Guard facilities responded to public concerns for a ready military force. Armories were erected within communities to serve as auxiliary training and gathering centers for civilian soldiers. Installations such as Camp Ritchie afforded these soldiers the opportunity to practice defensive maneuvers, marksmanship, and other training activities in a realistic setting.

Camp Ritchie served primarily as a summer training area for Maryland National Guard units. Construction began in May 1926 with the mess halls, bath houses, kitchen and administrative buildings. Soldiers were housed in tents, first with dirt floors and later concrete tent pads. Units came for a period of two to four weeks to practice drills and weapons operation. Numerous rifle and small arms ranges were constructed to accommodate such practice. In addition to providing services to its soldiers, the Camp provided a dining facility, recreation and entertainment to the local community.

Camp Ritchie continued to serve in this capacity until 1942. With the onset of World War II, additional military training facilities were needed across the country. Camp Ritchie offered solid infrastructure and a remote mountainous setting that was in relatively close proximity to Washington D.C. Its remote location made it difficult for a foreigner to penetrate or linger in the vicinity without drawing local attention. It also lacked local distractions which might have detracted from the serious study of intelligence tactics. Furthermore, Washington could quickly forward the latest information, captured prisoners or materials to the Camp Ritchie locations (Strain 1993:220). The property was leased from the State of Maryland, existing buildings were modified for new uses, and temporary wooden buildings were constructed to accommodate an influx of troops. Between 1942 and 1946, the United States Army trained 19,669 military intelligence specialists at the site.

Architecture and Design The Camp Ritchie Historic District is also eligible for listing on the National Register under Criterion C for architecture. It is a cohesive group of fieldstone buildings designed to make use of local materials and to harmonize with the mountainous natural surroundings. The buildings are designed around significant landscape features and retain integrity of design, workmanship and location.

Initial efforts were focused on the construction of 19 small square stone buildings with fireplaces to be used as kitchens by the platoons of the First Maryland Regiment. Completed in 1926, these buildings were quickly modified in 1927 with additions so that the troops could eat indoors, out of the elements (History of Fort Ritchie Up Until WWII:9.) The buildings, located on the southwest end of Barrick Avenue (approximately Buildings 305-322), are now known as the "finger buildings" because they are long and narrow. Other buildings were constructed to support the camp, such as Headquarters (Bldg. 200), Lakeside Hall (Bldg. 11), headquarters company mess (Bldg. 205), administration facilities (Bldg. 201), a stable (Bldg. 401), and various bath houses. Soldiers were quartered in tents until W.W.II when temporary barracks were constructed. In order to accommodate the soldiers and mission, the terrain was cleared and the landscape extensively modified, numerous roads were constructed, and water, electrical and waste disposal systems were installed.

The 58th Brigade Headquarters (Building 200) was constructed in the castellated style popular at National Guard armories in the United States between 1877 and the first decade of the 20th century. Reminiscent of medieval castles, the style featured the form and architectural details characteristic of these structures. The most prominent features are the towers flanking the central entrance and the crenellated roofline. The castellated style and fortress aspects of armories remained prevalent in Maryland long after other states had abandoned these styles. In fact, Maryland continued to build National Guard armories in this style until 1938. Captain Barrick drew the original plans for the Brigade Headquarters in September 1926 and they were approved by the Commanding General of the Maryland National Guard during the same month. However, actual construction extended into 1928.

Construction picked up in early 1929, although budget constraints were becoming evident with some work undertaken under promissory note. Land was graded for the placement of 210 concrete slabs that were to serve as bases for bivouac tents on the hill southeast of the finger buildings. The sewage system was expanded and a new disposal plant constructed (Camp Ritchie, Maryland, 1940:2). Roads were resurfaced during the year and a covered corral for forty horses was built where the Health Clinic now stands (Building 341). A major beautification effort was begun during the year, and 25,000 flowers, shrubs, and conifers were planted.

Major building activities occurred between late 1931 and 1933 with the implementation of Public Works Projects. Later, in 1934 and 1935, the Works Progress Administration and other programs of the New Deal ushered in additional work. This stage was completed through contracting services, although the stylistic parameters and layout of the Post established by Barrick were maintained.

Several buildings and landscape elements existed when the camp was constructed, including Bldg. 4 and Bldg. 155. All buildings were retained for use by the National Guard and modified to meet soldier needs. Two lakes associated with the Buena Vista Ice Company were major elements of the site requiring significant attention in designing and maintaining the camp.

Reconstruction of the dam at Lake Royer required installation of a "new concrete spillway" which allowed the lake to be filled (Barrick 1965:1-2). The area around the upper lake was also re-engineered, involving a significant amount of excavation and terrain re-contouring. Lake Royer was "reconditioned and made ready for use" in 1927 (Camp Ritchie, Maryland, 1940:1). Two years later, on June 19, 1929, the south bank of the lower lake between the spillway and the Western Maryland Railroad gave way. The water rushed down Red Run Falls Creek and damage was done in the vicinity of Rouzerville, Pennsylvania. Captain Barrick set about ensuring that the dam would not burst again. He and his men "built large core walls in the earth banks" 31 feet deep and "extending 110 feet on each side of the spillway" (Camp Ritchie, Maryland, 1940:2-3).

An effort was also made to strengthen the dam at Lake Wastler. "Men used picks and shovels and dump carts to haul the dirt to build the embankment which shored up and reinforced the banks of the upper lake, where the stony spillway is" (Dietrich 1972: 5). However, the map of the Buena Vista Ice Company property depicts the upper lake once as having had two spillways that drained into the lower lake. It appears that Barrick may have removed the northernmost spillway of the upper lake.

The lakes, parade ground and homogenous architecture create a cohesive historic district of buildings representing Camp Ritchie. This installation was important to the state and federal military system in support of the United States' commitment to military preparedness and defense and for these reasons is eligible for inclusion on the National Register of Historic Places.
